And all of a sudden you notice something strange. A pair of totally nude people in full-on sexual intercourse. Well, it's not strange. It's incredibly common. Everyone does it at some point. It's called "sexual experimentation" and it's normal. But just how common is it? The Kinsey Institute, a non-profit organization that studies human sexual behavior, recently published a study that examined sexual experimentation among American college students. They found that about one in five college men and one in six college women report having engaged in sexual experimentation. According to the study, college men were more than twice as likely to report having had sex before age 14, and almost twice as likely to have engaged in sexual experimentation. College women were twice as likely to have had sex before age 14 and also more than twice as likely to have engaged in sexual experimentation. But what is sexual experimentation? Let's go back to baseball game. Remember the two totally naked people? The researchers define sexual experimentation as: "A consensual act(s) with another person, initiated without the expectation of serious/long-term relationships or marriage, but including oral, anal or genital contact, for purposes of sexual excitement or stimulation, with the intent to initiate sexual activity or for purposes of masturbating." In other words, if you're thinking about a couple of all-nude people in full-on sexual intercourse, you're probably engaging in sexual experimentation. This happens with women and men in all ages, but it's generally most common during the teen years. And when it comes to women, the same Kinsey study that found one in six women having sex before age 14 also found that the majority of women having sex before age 14 are experimenting with men. So you're right. It's common. And you're right. It's not strange.

Now, what do we know about sexual experimentation?

According to the Kinsey study, it's a common behavior
