Counterarguments Counterarguments are potential arguments which can be used to rebut and/or defeat one or more arguments made in favor of an argumentative position. Counterarguments can be categorized into two broad types: rebuttals (pushed inwards to the original argument) and refutations (pushed outwards to a different argument). In the context of communication within specific fields, counterarguments may be used to argue that a given argument in favor of a position in a specific discussion is weak, flawed or unsound. When used as a tactic of persuasion, rebutting an argument with a separate point in favor of a different position is often described as a "logical fallacy", as the new argument is just one that leads to a different conclusion. When used in a tactical sense, it is common to use counterarguments only as a means of distracting or diverting the initial argument, from a stronger to a weaker position. In critical thinking, the internal consistency of a rebuttal will be assessed, such as whether it deals with the subject matter at hand, and how it relates to the original argument. The 9-foot figure, dressed in Viking armour and wearing a traditional helmet, has been designed to honour the contributions of indigenous peoples to Britain throughout its history. The Pembroke project was funded by the Heritage Lottery Fund and is part of the Museums in Libraries service. An exhibition featuring the life-size statue, as well as artefacts recovered in the local area, will run until 21 June 2013. Subtle features, like shapes on the shield or the design of the helmet crest, can give a clue to the culture of the people who have occupied the land. The last Viking arrival in Britain was nearly 900 years ago, and it took different forms to survive and evolve in the different environments. In the case of Pembrokeshire, the most recent Vikings, arriving in the ninth century, were Picts. Their name comes from the crescent-shaped design on their clothes. Pictish tattoos were found in the Neolithic settlement at Creswell Crags, the oldest in England. The first recorded pictures of the Viking helmet come from the late eighth century. Other than these, what is recorded in the written sources is the Viking's conquest, battles, raids, the names of captured lands and the eventual destruction of the Viking settlements in Britain. At the same time, the Viking raids on Ireland and France were also taking place, and the weapons and clothing they created there influenced those in England and Scotland. The new life-sized replica statue has been created using a children's toy block, and is made from colourful plastic with reflective 3e33713323
